

Is Communication the real Name of the Game?

I am a real believer in the fact that we all could do with a little help when it comes to communicating amongst our peers.

Communication skills often leave us prone to argument when disagreements become SUBJECTIVE.

How good would it be for you and your organisation if I could offer you a way to communicate at any level in such a way that every discussion was:-

- POSITIVE for all concerned
- Based on AGREED STRENGTHS before anything else
- Worked towards just one or two specifics that you both agreed would make overall improvements for everyone in a short time frame.

A method that would allow you and your team(s):-

- to define the elements that really make a difference when it comes to getting the job done.
- to find an agreed measure of success for every party involved such that any team could make the very best use of every individual's skills without unnecessary overlap.
- to work towards a common goal on a day to day basis without the need for annual personal reviews.
- To find ways of solving almost any problem you can define by using the strengths of every member of your business who might be involved.

Can anything really be that SIMPLE?

If this was the team managers view of just one team member's strengths, how might a discussion between him or her and that team member develop?

This was how the individual responded to the same analysis – what do you make of this?
